Highlights

- In order to complete the work created by the bill, the Ohio Civil Rights Commission may need additional resources. At a minimum, this would likely include the need to hire two additional staff, estimated to cost $160,000 ($80,000 per employee, inclusive of benefits) per year. The Commission's available GRF and federal funding may not be sufficient to cover that cost.
- The courts of commons pleas may experience a savings effect on their annual operating costs stemming from a possible reduction in employment discrimination lawsuits due to the bill's provisions that generally require a person first file a charge with the Ohio Civil Rights Commission and the tolling of the statute of limitations to file a lawsuit.

Detailed Analysis

The bill primarily affects two entities – the Ohio Civil Rights Commission (OCRC) and courts of common pleas – by requiring the exhaustion of specified OCRC procedures prior to filing a lawsuit alleging unlawful discriminatory practices relating to employment. Because of the bill, additional discrimination charges will be filed with the Commission; it is possible that, if cases are mediated instead of a right to sue notice being issued, fewer lawsuits will be filed with the courts. These effects largely result from provisions in the bill that: (1) decrease the time in which lawsuits related to employment discrimination can be brought (from six years to two years), (2) increase the time a charge can be filed with the Commission (from six months to two years), and (3) impose an exhaustion requirement that generally bars concurrent actions in the courts and the Commission.

Statute of limitations for lawsuits

The bill decreases the time in which civil actions related to employment discrimination can be brought from six years to two years, with exceptions, to mirror the statute of limitations that lawsuits related to discrimination in the workplace can be brought under federal law. Except for cases under federal law and certain age discrimination cases, the reduction in the statute of limitations could decrease the number of lawsuits filed with the courts of common pleas or, if the lawsuit is filed against the state as an employer, with the Court of Claims.

Commission timeframes and procedures

Current law requires a charge alleging employment discrimination to be filed with the Commission within six months after the act was committed. The bill increases that filing timeframe to within two years after the act was committed. The Commission expects this change to result in additional employment discrimination cases requiring investigation that may otherwise have been unpursued or filed with the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC).¹ From FY 2015 through FY 2019, the number of new filings with the Commission averaged 3,386 annually, over 70% of which were employment-related.

The bill generally prohibits, with exceptions, a person from filing an employment discrimination lawsuit unless the person has exhausted Commission procedures, including issuance of a notice of right to sue. A person who files a charge with the Commission may make a written request for the right to sue which cannot be granted until at least 60 days after the filing. A right to sue notice will be issued without such a request if the Commission determines from a preliminary investigation that it is not probable that an unlawful discriminatory practice related to employment has occurred. The Commission may immediately grant a request if it is made more than 60 days after the charge was filed. A person is prohibited from refiling the charge after a dismissal. If the Commission fails to provide the requested notice of right to sue within 45 days after the date that the Commission may grant the request, the person may proceed with the lawsuit.

The above-noted filing timeframe and procedural changes will increase the Commission's workload and may require additional resources. At a minimum, this would likely include the need to hire two additional staff, estimated to cost $160,000 ($80,000 per employee, inclusive of benefits) per year. The Commission's available GRF and federal funding may not be sufficient to cover that cost.

Definition of employer

Under current law, the definition of employer means the state, any political subdivision of the state, or a person employing four or more persons within the state and any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer. The bill removes any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of the employer and adds an agent of the state, political subdivision, or person. The bill's definition could reduce the number of individuals against whom a claim of employment-related discrimination may be filed with the Commission and/or the courts compared to current law.
